Housing people who need it most

Some people experience homelessness for a long time and need extra help to get on their feet and remain housed. We connect these community members with supportive housing services.

Home for Good has helped 75 people achieve housing stability as of December 2023—and others are closer to finding a place to call home. We've proven what we know to be true: Supportive housing works. The ongoing support services we provide are creating a winning formula for participants to find and keep housing.

Receiving funding based on successes

People without homes often need help finding them. Home for Good receives funding from the Municipality of Anchorage based on a pay for success model. It tracks how many people are housed and how long they remain housed.

We're building on the success of Home for Good and scaling it to better meet our community's needs. Doing so helps ensure that homelessness is rare, brief, and one time. Read about this supportive housing program.

Jon shuffled between Brother Francis, Sullivan Arena and Centennial Park before moving into Guest House. He'd lost his home when his mother died.

"Once you're on the streets, it's hard to get off," says Jon. "For a long time, I didn't give a hoot." Then, Home for Good identified Jon as a person to help.

"A case manager came to my tent and told me she was working on getting me into a home," he says. When she came back, he recalls her saying, "Pack up your stuff. You're moving into your own home."

Jon's remained housed and received support for a year. "I want to be independent and feel like I'm contributing." Having a place to call home is helping Jon take his next steps.

People who've experienced homelessness for a long time need extra help getting back on their feet. Home for Good connects them with housing and support services so, like Jon, they can all take their next steps.
