March 15 2020 - May 31, 2021

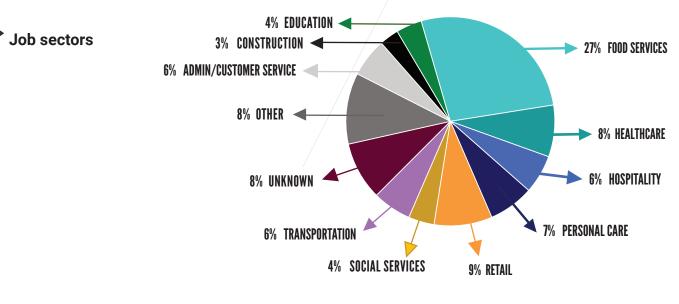

The coronavirus pandemic is delivering unprecedented economic challenges to thousands of Alaskans.

- Job losses remain historically large, and unemployment claims during the second week of March, 2021 had five times the unemployment claims of the same week in 2020.
- Leisure and hospitality continues to record the largest job losses, but as of April 2021 has started to see its first uptick.

Hundreds of individuals, companies, foundations, and organizations have stepped up to help our neighbors.

These are some of our neighbors who received assistance from the MOA Rental Assistance Response Fund.

She ran a one-chair hair salon in Muldoon when the curtain fell on appointments and her temporary job at Target ended. She described working on several fronts to improve her finances. Fearing eviction, she called 2-1-1 who in turn referred her to Luthern Social Services for rent assistance. She's hoping to combine work and school as she looks to train to become a certified medical assistant.

A husband and wife saw their income drop dramatically when his hours at Capital Glass were cut. The rental assistance boost from AK Can Do would keep them housed until his return to full time work produced a paycheck to keep pace with the family's expenses. The parents of a one-year old son, who'd been born prematurely, said of the help they received, "It's a miracle. Our family is safe."

A 32-year-old woman scrambled to make ends meet teaching music and dance, along with other gig work, when the pandemic gutted her finances. She got her car insurance payments deferred, but a mix-up on the date when the deferment started left her bank account overdrawn and her rent unpaid. "I was in a house on fire and saying, 'Everything is gonna be fine," she recounted. "But it's not fine. I don't have a bucket of water." Thanks to AK Can Do, Lutheran Social Services had that figurative bucket of water, a check for $975 that put out the fire of the unpaid rent.
